The Liberator. September 23, 1852.

The Editor.

My dear Sir,

I am sorry to hear that you are not in favor of the terraces system of farming. I think it is the most economical and practical system known. It is said to save labor, and to increase the yield of the crops. It is also said to improve the soil, by preventing the washing away of the topsoil.

Yours truly,

W. L. FARRAR.
From Stedman's Magazine.

THE FIRMAMENT OF HUMAN LIFE.

There is nothing in the entire world so like the firmament of our blue earth as the firmament of a summer night, when the stars are bright and full, and the moon is high and clear.

From every point of view, the human condition is like the firmament of the earth, in the midst of the stars.

When we are young, we are full of dreams and plans, and the world is all before us. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are bright and full, and the moon is high and clear.

But as we grow older, our dreams and plans fade away, and the world seems like a dark and gloomy place. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are dim and faint, and the moon is low and dark.

And so it is with the human condition. When we are young, we are full of dreams and plans, and the world is all before us. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are bright and full, and the moon is high and clear.

But as we grow older, our dreams and plans fade away, and the world seems like a dark and gloomy place. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are dim and faint, and the moon is low and dark.

And so it is with the human condition. When we are young, we are full of dreams and plans, and the world is all before us. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are bright and full, and the moon is high and clear.

But as we grow older, our dreams and plans fade away, and the world seems like a dark and gloomy place. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are dim and faint, and the moon is low and dark.

And so it is with the human condition. When we are young, we are full of dreams and plans, and the world is all before us. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are bright and full, and the moon is high and clear.

But as we grow older, our dreams and plans fade away, and the world seems like a dark and gloomy place. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are dim and faint, and the moon is low and dark.

And so it is with the human condition. When we are young, we are full of dreams and plans, and the world is all before us. We are like the stars in the firmament of the earth, when they are bright and full, and the moon is high and clear.