[For the Liberator.]

AUNT MARIA AND THE YOUNG PULEX.

How glad we are that you have come again! The pleasant company of the children is so refreshing to us after the weariness of our work. We are so glad to see the little ones, and how they have grown and improved in every way.

Shout M., in order to tell all this, must go back to the time when the western Indians were first brought to this country by the Spaniards. You, George, and Catharine, and every other Indian, were taken by force from your homes and families, and forced to come to this country. The Spaniards cut off the hands of the Indians and sold them as slaves. But when the Spaniards left this country, the Indians were still left here.

You know how the Spaniards treated the slaves. They killed the men, and took the women and children away to work as slaves. They forced the Indians to work for them, and they did not let them have any of the things they needed. But when the Spaniards left, the Indians became free and were left to their own devices.

Shout M. says that when the Spaniards left, the Indians were left to their own devices. They were left to work for themselves, and they were able to do what they pleased. They were able to make their own lives, and to have a chance to be happy.

So you see, Shout M. says, that when the Spaniards left, the Indians became free and were left to their own devices. They were able to do what they pleased, and to have a chance to be happy.
