Suppose South Carolina were an island, for the convenience of the ocean, or any other land; and let us visualize the site of it, and all its inhabitants in the event of its sudden completion, and the black man in slavery—that is, his condition in the state, as one of the elements that cannot be altered.

Let us consider the situation of the Negroes in the United States from the standpoint of the law, and the law of the nation, and the law of the world. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man.

Let us consider the situation of the Negroes in the United States from the standpoint of the law, and the law of the nation, and the law of the world. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man.

Let us consider the situation of the Negroes in the United States from the standpoint of the law, and the law of the nation, and the law of the world. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man.

Let us consider the situation of the Negroes in the United States from the standpoint of the law, and the law of the nation, and the law of the world. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man.

Let us consider the situation of the Negroes in the United States from the standpoint of the law, and the law of the nation, and the law of the world. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man.

Let us consider the situation of the Negroes in the United States from the standpoint of the law, and the law of the nation, and the law of the world. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man. The law of the nation is such that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen, and the law of the world is that the Negro is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a man.
DEBATE ON THE TARIFF.

Extracts from the speech of John G. D. LONG, on the Tariff, Made in the Senate of the United States, March 10, 1828.

The position he had assumed was that the Bill should not be considered for discussion on the Floor of the Senate, unless the public was satisfied that the present industrial and commercial condition of the country was such as to warrant the adoption of a measure that would restore the nation to its national and commercial standing.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.

The position he took was that the Tariff should be reduced, as it was the only way to restore the country to its former condition. He believed that the present condition of the country was such that a reduction in the Tariff would not only benefit the country, but also provide a stimulus for the return of industry and commerce.

He advocated for the reduction of the Tariff as a means to increase the production of American goods and to make the country more self-sufficient.
MISCELLANEOUS.

Extract of a letter to the Editors of the Portland JOURNAL, Feb. 23d, 1864.

I was surprised, the other day, with Mr. Colburn. He had been in the neighborhood, examining the stock, and purchasing some new ones. He seemed very pleased with the results of his visit.

Mr. Colburn said he had been in the neighborhood, examining the stock, and purchasing some new ones. He seemed very pleased with the results of his visit.

From the Washington correspondent of the N.

Mr. Colburn was occasionally eloquent, but not to the point of being fatiguing. His manner and air were those of a man who has been in the habit of expressing his opinions in a refined and graceful manner. He had a high and dignified air, and his conversation was full of spirituality and wisdom.

Mr. Colburn had last year, and was, for that reason, determined to go to the Washington correspondent. He had been at the hotel, and seen the contents of the Washington correspondent, and the Washington correspondent, and the Washington correspondent, and the Washington correspondent, and the Washington correspondent.

And such a speech I have never heard from a man who has been in the habit of expressing his opinions in a refined and graceful manner, and his conversation was full of spirituality and wisdom.

Robert Yates, Jr., President of the Pennsylvania.

The Board of Directors consists of John W. Niles, Secretary of the Board.

Dr. Thomas Jefferson, in his will, bequeathed his library to the University of Virginia, and the books were sold by auction. The sale was held in the court-house at Charlottesville, on the 20th of July, 1813.