African Colonization is a beneficial measure.

The fact that one is the only real means of ending the suffering of the African race is conclusively proved by the facts already given.

The abolition of slavery is a step in the right direction, but it is not a complete solution of the problem. The colonization of Africa is a more effective way of solving the problem of the negro population.

abolition and colonization [By Eliza Webster, Jr.]

No portion of the subject of the slavery question is more deeply impressed upon the public mind than this, viz., abolition or colonization; and it is the object of the present article to institute a careful and impartial examination of these two great alternatives. It is not the purpose of the writer to enter into a full discussion of the merits or demerits of either; but to present a clear and distinct view of the subject, and to do so in a manner that shall be indicative of the true and just character of each.

Abolition.-Abolition is the immediate and direct means of the abolition of slavery. The abolitionists, or those who advocate it, believe that the only possible remedy for slavery is the immediate emancipation of the slave. They believe that the slave is a human being, and should be treated as such, and that no system of government or society can be just or right unless it provides for the complete and complete abolition of slavery. They believe that the government of the United States has the power to abolish slavery, and that it is the duty of the government to do so.

Colonization.-Colonization is the permanent solution of the slavery question. The colonizers, or those who advocate it, believe that the only permanent way to deal with slavery is to send the slave to Africa, where he can live in peace and plenty, and where he will become a useful member of society. They believe that the government of the United States has the power to colonize the slave, and that it is the duty of the government to do so.

In conclusion, it may be said that the abolitionist and the colonizer are both right, and that the government of the United States should endeavor to do both. The government should seek to abolish slavery as soon as possible, and at the same time should provide for the colonization of the slave, so that he may become a useful member of society, and live in peace and plenty.
