SLAVERY IN KENTUCKY

Extract from a speech of M. Healy, in the Kentucky Legislature.

Mr. Chairman, there is one question which this Committee has been brought into, and which is not excepted in the question of the Emancipation of Slaves. It is that of the protection of the master in his property. We are all aware that there are those who are unscrupulous, and whose only object is to promote their own interest. They are not only unscrupulous, but they are also very much interested in every respect. They have always been very much interested in every respect. They have always been very much interested in every respect. They have always been very much interested in every respect. They have always been very much interested in every respect.

SLAVERY

Washington, Feb. 18, 1836.

The provisions of another amendment for the abolition of slavery are now in operation in the District of Columbia. They are not only reasonable, but they are also necessary to the safety and welfare of the country. The laws of the United States are in operation in the District of Columbia, and the provisions of the amendment are in force in the District of Columbia. The amendment is in force in the District of Columbia, and the provisions of the amendment are in force in the District of Columbia.

THE DANGER OF ABOLITION.

The danger of abolition is not only present, but it is also increasing. The abolition of slavery is a danger, and it is also increasing. The abolition of slavery is a danger, and it is also increasing. The abolition of slavery is a danger, and it is also increasing. The abolition of slavery is a danger, and it is also increasing.
