And the more they try, the more their claims ring hollow. They say they hate the war, they say they wish it were over. Yet, they still have their guns, their bullets, their fighters. They say they want peace, but they really mean to keep many slave states in the Union. They say they want to end the war, but they really mean to keep the South's way of life intact.

On June 18, 1863, in a fierce battle of the American Civil War, the Union Army under Ulysses S. Grant won a decisive victory against the Confederacy at the Battle of Gettysburg. The battle lasted three days and ended with the Union Army in control of the battlefield. The victory marked a turning point in the war and was a significant milestone in the Union's efforts to end slavery and preserve the Union.

The battle was fought near Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, and is one of the bloodiest and most famous battles in American history. The Union Army suffered 23,000 casualties, while the Confederacy lost 14,000. The Union victory was a significant blow to the Confederacy's ability to continue fighting and marked the beginning of the end of the war.

Now, it's been a year since the battle. The nation is still divided, but the people are starting to come together. The war is far from over, but there is hope that it will end someday soon. The Union is determined to keep fighting until slavery is abolished and the country is reunited. The Confederacy is fighting to keep their way of life intact, but they know it's a losing battle.

The people of the nation are tired of war and they want peace. They want to be able to live their lives without fear of war. They want to be able to work and raise families without worrying about the next battle. They want to be able to live in a country where everyone is treated equally, regardless of their skin color.

But the war is not over yet. The Union is determined to keep fighting until slavery is abolished and the country is reunited. The Confederacy is fighting to keep their way of life intact, but they know it's a losing battle. The people of the nation are tired of war and they want peace. They want to be able to live their lives without fear of war. They want to be able to work and raise families without worrying about the next battle. They want to be able to live in a country where everyone is treated equally, regardless of their skin color.