A GERMAN VIEW OF AMERICAN FREEDOM.

Of all the nations where the European revolution has produced beneficial results, the United States is the country where the principle of universal suffrage has been realized with the most striking success. The American Constitution, in declaring all men to be born free and equal, has laid the basis of this freedom. It has been further extended by the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, which maintains that the right to natural liberty is inherent in every individual. The principle of this constitution has been carried into practice by the establishment of a system of popular government, in which the people are the sole source of power, and in which every citizen, without regard to rank or profession, has the right to vote. This has been made possible by the adoption of a system of universal suffrage, which has been further extended by the adoption of the 15th Amendment, which prohibits the denial of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.
