THE LIBERATOR.

JULY 15, 1852.

VOL. XXII. NO. 17.

The Liberator.

ADMITTANCE CONTESTED.

By James W. Redfield.

It is interesting to observe how the public purpose in which the Federal Government is engaged, is developing the spirit of patriotism in the people. One of the most prominent features of the present administration is the attempt to carry through Congress the measures which will enable the Federal Government to become a real and effective instrument for the public welfare. In this endeavor, the Republican party has taken the lead, and the Democratic party has been compelled to follow. The result has been that the Republicans have secured a majority in Congress, and have been able to carry their measures through. This has been done by the strong arm of the people, who have been won over to the Republican side by the prospect of a better future under their administration.

The Democrats have been defeated, and are now seeking a new lease of life by a policy of opposition. They have attempted to vindicate their position by a vigorous attack on the Republican administration, and have made it their business to point out the defects of the new system. They have done this with a view to exciting the people against it, and to secure a majority in the future elections. The result of this policy has been to create a great deal of excitement, and to make the parties more and more bitter. The debate on the admission of the new states into the Union has been one of the most exciting features of the campaign, and has been marked by a extraordinary amount of oratory.

The Democrats have attempted to show that the new states are not sufficiently developed to enter the Union, and that their admission would be prejudicial to the interests of the country. They have also attempted to prove that the admission of the new states would be accompanied with a loss of revenue, and would therefore be detrimental to the financial interests of the country. The Republicans have met this attack by showing that the new states are fully capable of bearing the cost of their admission, and that they will contribute a large amount of revenue to the Federal treasury. They have also shown that the admission of the new states will be of great benefit to the country, and will be a step in the right direction.

The debate has been conducted with great skill and ability, and has been marked by a great deal of good temper. Both parties have attempted to show their respect for the other, and have endeavored to avoid personal allusions. The result has been that the debate has been conducted in a dignified and serious manner, and has been attended with no serious bickerings.

The next session of Congress is to be held in a few weeks, and it is to be expected that the measures which have been discussed in the present session will be continued. The Republicans have the majority, and are therefore in a strong position to carry their measures through. The Democrats, on the other hand, are in a weak position, and are likely to be defeated.

The outcome of this debate will have a great bearing on the future of the country. The Republicans, if victorious, will be able to carry their measures through, and will be able to advance the interests of the country. The Democrats, on the other hand, if defeated, will be unable to carry their measures through, and will be unable to advance the interests of the country.

THE SOUTHERN BATTLE OF CONGRESS.

The battle of Congress is being waged in the South, and the Republicans are gaining ground. The Democratic party has been defeated, and is now seeking a new lease of life by a policy of opposition. They have attempted to vindicate their position by a vigorous attack on the Republican administration, and have made it their business to point out the defects of the new system. They have done this with a view to exciting the people against it, and to secure a majority in the future elections. The result of this policy has been to create a great deal of excitement, and to make the parties more and more bitter. The debate on the admission of the new states into the Union has been one of the most exciting features of the campaign, and has been marked by a extraordinary amount of oratory.

The Democrats have attempted to show that the new states are not sufficiently developed to enter the Union, and that their admission would be prejudicial to the interests of the country. They have also attempted to prove that the admission of the new states would be accompanied with a loss of revenue, and would therefore be detrimental to the financial interests of the country. The Republicans have met this attack by showing that the new states are fully capable of bearing the cost of their admission, and that they will contribute a large amount of revenue to the Federal treasury. They have also shown that the admission of the new states will be of great benefit to the country, and will be a step in the right direction.

The debate has been conducted with great skill and ability, and has been marked by a great deal of good temper. Both parties have attempted to show their respect for the other, and have endeavored to avoid personal allusions. The result has been that the debate has been conducted in a dignified and serious manner, and has been attended with no serious bickerings.

The next session of Congress is to be held in a few weeks, and it is to be expected that the measures which have been discussed in the present session will be continued. The Republicans have the majority, and are therefore in a strong position to carry their measures through. The Democrats, on the other hand, are in a weak position, and are likely to be defeated.

The outcome of this debate will have a great bearing on the future of the country. The Republicans, if victorious, will be able to carry their measures through, and will be able to advance the interests of the country. The Democrats, on the other hand, if defeated, will be unable to carry their measures through, and will be unable to advance the interests of the country.

THE REPUBLICAN PROGRAM.

The Republican program is being formulated, and it is to be expected that it will be adopted at the next session of Congress. The Democrats have been defeated, and are now seeking a new lease of life by a policy of opposition. They have attempted to vindicate their position by a vigorous attack on the Republican administration, and have made it their business to point out the defects of the new system. They have done this with a view to exciting the people against it, and to secure a majority in the future elections. The result of this policy has been to create a great deal of excitement, and to make the parties more and more bitter. The debate on the admission of the new states into the Union has been one of the most exciting features of the campaign, and has been marked by a extraordinary amount of oratory.

The Democrats have attempted to show that the new states are not sufficiently developed to enter the Union, and that their admission would be prejudicial to the interests of the country. They have also attempted to prove that the admission of the new states would be accompanied with a loss of revenue, and would therefore be detrimental to the financial interests of the country. The Republicans have met this attack by showing that the new states are fully capable of bearing the cost of their admission, and that they will contribute a large amount of revenue to the Federal treasury. They have also shown that the admission of the new states will be of great benefit to the country, and will be a step in the right direction.

The debate has been conducted with great skill and ability, and has been marked by a great deal of good temper. Both parties have attempted to show their respect for the other, and have endeavored to avoid personal allusions. The result has been that the debate has been conducted in a dignified and serious manner, and has been attended with no serious bickerings.

The next session of Congress is to be held in a few weeks, and it is to be expected that the measures which have been discussed in the present session will be continued. The Republicans have the majority, and are therefore in a strong position to carry their measures through. The Democrats, on the other hand, are in a weak position, and are likely to be defeated.

The outcome of this debate will have a great bearing on the future of the country. The Republicans, if victorious, will be able to carry their measures through, and will be able to advance the interests of the country. The Democrats, on the other hand, if defeated, will be unable to carry their measures through, and will be unable to advance the interests of the country.

THE DEMOCRATIC PROGRAM.

The Democratic program is being formulated, and it is to be expected that it will be adopted at the next session of Congress. The Democrats have been defeated, and are now seeking a new lease of life by a policy of opposition. They have attempted to vindicate their position by a vigorous attack on the Republican administration, and have made it their business to point out the defects of the new system. They have done this with a view to exciting the people against it, and to secure a majority in the future elections. The result of this policy has been to create a great deal of excitement, and to make the parties more and more bitter. The debate on the admission of the new states into the Union has been one of the most exciting features of the campaign, and has been marked by a extraordinary amount of oratory.

The Democrats have attempted to show that the new states are not sufficiently developed to enter the Union, and that their admission would be prejudicial to the interests of the country. They have also attempted to prove that the admission of the new states would be accompanied with a loss of revenue, and would therefore be detrimental to the financial interests of the country. The Republicans have met this attack by showing that the new states are fully capable of bearing the cost of their admission, and that they will contribute a large amount of revenue to the Federal treasury. They have also shown that the admission of the new states will be of great benefit to the country, and will be a step in the right direction.

The debate has been conducted with great skill and ability, and has been marked by a great deal of good temper. Both parties have attempted to show their respect for the other, and have endeavored to avoid personal allusions. The result has been that the debate has been conducted in a dignified and serious manner, and has been attended with no serious bickerings.

The next session of Congress is to be held in a few weeks, and it is to be expected that the measures which have been discussed in the present session will be continued. The Republicans have the majority, and are therefore in a strong position to carry their measures through. The Democrats, on the other hand, are in a weak position, and are likely to be defeated.

The outcome of this debate will have a great bearing on the future of the country. The Republicans, if victorious, will be able to carry their measures through, and will be able to advance the interests of the country. The Democrats, on the other hand, if defeated, will be unable to carry their measures through, and will be unable to advance the interests of the country.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

The Republican platform is being formulated, and it is to be expected that it will be adopted at the next session of Congress. The Democrats have been defeated, and are now seeking a new lease of life by a policy of opposition. They have attempted to vindicate their position by a vigorous attack on the Republican administration, and have made it their business to point out the defects of the new system. They have done this with a view to exciting the people against it, and to secure a majority in the future elections. The result of this policy has been to create a great deal of excitement, and to make the parties more and more bitter. The debate on the admission of the new states into the Union has been one of the most exciting features of the campaign, and has been marked by a extraordinary amount of oratory.

The Democrats have attempted to show that the new states are not sufficiently developed to enter the Union, and that their admission would be prejudicial to the interests of the country. They have also attempted to prove that the admission of the new states would be accompanied with a loss of revenue, and would therefore be detrimental to the financial interests of the country. The Republicans have met this attack by showing that the new states are fully capable of bearing the cost of their admission, and that they will contribute a large amount of revenue to the Federal treasury. They have also shown that the admission of the new states will be of great benefit to the country, and will be a step in the right direction.

The debate has been conducted with great skill and ability, and has been marked by a great deal of good temper. Both parties have attempted to show their respect for the other, and have endeavored to avoid personal allusions. The result has been that the debate has been conducted in a dignified and serious manner, and has been attended with no serious bickerings.

The next session of Congress is to be held in a few weeks, and it is to be expected that the measures which have been discussed in the present session will be continued. The Republicans have the majority, and are therefore in a strong position to carry their measures through. The Democrats, on the other hand, are in a weak position, and are likely to be defeated.

The outcome of this debate will have a great bearing on the future of the country. The Republicans, if victorious, will be able to carry their measures through, and will be able to advance the interests of the country. The Democrats, on the other hand, if defeated, will be unable to carry their measures through, and will be unable to advance the interests of the country.