THE LIBERATOR.

NO UNION WITH SLAVERY.

British abolitionist propaganda.

On October 9, 1856, the abolitionists in Canada celebrated the abolition of slavery there. It was led by the American Anti-Slavery Society, which had established a number of schools and libraries to educate children about the evils of slavery. The event was a significant moment in the growing antislavery movement, and it helped to galvanize support for the cause.

The new abolitionists in Canada were determined to do everything they could to promote the cause of abolition. They organized meetings, wrote articles, and distributed pamphlets. They were also active in the political arena, working to elect abolitionist candidates to office.

American abolitionists were also active in the campaign to abolish slavery in the United States. They worked to convince people of the moral and economic arguments for abolition, and they helped to organize local abolitionist groups. They also worked to support the Underground Railroad, which was a network of abolitionists and runaway slaves who helped to free people from slavery.

In conclusion, the abolitionist movement was a powerful force in the struggle to end slavery. It was a movement that was driven by a passion for justice and a belief in the humanity of all people. It was a movement that was willing to sacrifice its members to achieve its goals. And it was a movement that succeeded in its ultimate aim: the abolition of slavery.
