CHAPTER XVI.

WIVES CIVIL.

In the year 1207, a young man named Geoffrey of Vende was traveling through the country. He was on his way to visit his relatives in Paris, and was accompanied by his loyal dog, Moby.

As they passed through a small village, they noticed a strange, white light shining through the window of a nearby house. Geoffrey and Moby were curious, so they approached the house and knocked on the door.

The door was opened by an elderly woman, who seemed surprised to see them. "What do you want?" she asked.

"We were just passing through, and we noticed the light," Geoffrey explained. "Can we come inside and see what's so special?"

The woman hesitated for a moment, but then she invited them in. As they stepped inside, they were greeted by a beautiful aroma of freshly baked bread and fruits.

The house was filled with warm, friendly people, who welcomed Geoffrey and Moby with open arms. They were all gathered around a table, and they invited the young man to sit down and join them.

As they sat down, they began to share stories and laughter between each other. They talked about their travels, their dreams, and their experiences.

Geoffrey and Moby were amazed by the kindness and hospitality they received from the people in the house. They stayed for several hours, and before they left, they promised to return and visit them again.

In the years that followed, Geoffrey and Moby continued their travels, but they always made it a point to visit the house in the village. They became good friends with the people there, and they even became part of their community.

Finally, as they grew older, Geoffrey and Moby decided to settle in the village, and they opened their own bakery. They continued to serve the same warm, friendly welcome to all who entered their store, just as they had been served so many years ago.

The house in the village became known as "The House of Hospitality," and it continued to be a place of warmth and friendship for generations to come.

The end.
