BAD BLOOD.

The prejudices and even mutual antipathies which always enter into the composition of a great people, and are properly called national passions, are never weaker than when a country is about to be divided by a war. The passions of a nation are always stronger than its objects. The passions of a nation are like the passions of a man. In the same way, the passions of a nation have their reasons. In the same way, the passions of a nation have their passions. In the same way, the passions of a nation have their passions.

GREATNESS AND WEALTH.

Greatness and wealth are not the same thing. Greatness is the power of the people, and wealth is the power of the government. Greatness is the power of the people, and wealth is the power of the government. Greatness is the power of the people, and wealth is the power of the government.

A Slavon Must Fiercely.

Extract from a speech delivered in the U.S. Senate, in support of the proposals to amend the Constitution.

President, Mr. President, shall not only be recusant of the proposal of the House of Representatives, but in support of the proposals to amend the Constitution.

The soldiers were 'Macedons,' we trust, to execute the stern necessity of the case. Let the Constitution of the United States, as it now is, be maintained. Let the Constitution of the United States, as it now is, be maintained. Let the Constitution of the United States, as it now is, be maintained.
