The Liberator.

The day long followed this way, and proved a victory.

To the Editor of the Liberator.

Gentlemen: —

The late operations of the War, and the extraordinary conduct of the Government, in its pursuit of military objects, coming as they do, after a long series of war-like measures, of an altogether pacific kind, have produced a general feeling of satisfaction, and a desire for the speedy completion of the contest.

With respect to the military objects, it is admitted that they are in a great measure attainable, and that the means for attaining them are within the power of the Government. The difficulty lies with the people, who are slow to act, and who are liable to be influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves.

It is true that the people are slow to act, but it is equally true that they are capable of action, and that they are actuated by a desire for the speedy conclusion of the War. The difficulty is to be found in the fact that they are influenced by the reports of the press, and the views of the Government, and the military authorities, to a greater degree than they would be if they were left to themselves. 