GENERAL LEE.

What has General Robert E. Lee done to deserve the honor of being placed among the heroes of the North? Has his courage been as unimpaired as that of the English hero, in his hour of triumph? Has he availed himself of his powers to act with freedom and to do good in his sphere? Has he been honest and true to his cause, or has he been false and faithless? Has he been a man of honor and integrity, or has he been a traitor and a criminal? These are questions which every thoughtful person must ask himself, and which no one can answer without doing justice to both the North and the South.

GENERAL LEE AND HIS PROFESSION.

By the people of the United States, General Lee is regarded as a hero of the South, and as such he is held in high esteem. He has done much to maintain the honor of his country, and to gain for it the respect of the world. He has been a true and faithful officer, and has done his duty well. He has been a brave and resolute leader, and has won for his country many a victory. He has been a man of high character, and has done much to establish the reputation of the South.

The war of the present generation has been a great war, and has been fought between the North and the South. It has been fought between the free and the slave, between the rich and the poor, between the educated and the uneducated, between the learned and the ignorant, between the civilized and the savage. It has been a great war, and has been fought with great earnestness. It has been a great war, and has been fought with great bitterness.

The people of the United States, and of the South, are proud of General Lee, and are glad to have him as their hero. They are glad to have him as their leader, and as their champion. They are glad to have him as their friend, and as their ally. They are glad to have him as their guide, and as their counselor. They are glad to have him as their companion, and as their companion in life. They are glad to have him as their friend, and as their friend in death.
